"TAXI! TAXI!"

Harry and Al are pals. They both love the same girls, they each like and detest the same kind of work. So one fine day finds them driving black and white and white taxicabs.

They each are despised by the same stout, hungry looking brute-bully. He in turn would rather mar their manly beauty than eat - and he's got some appetite.

The stout villain, too, is driving a car - and a fight for prominent positions in the taxi line, the fight for customers, for speed, everything confronts him for winning the two boys' enmity.

When the stout fellow wins a customer they take him or her away from his car by clever ruses. They chase each other through busy streets, and in the end - and a whirlwind end too - they conquer.
